Parce que no Charfi advocates a profound revision of Islamic thought.

As an anthropologist she cited the many questions to which the political author Houellebecq travelled there when writing the book; he was at first given a bed in a room set up for the homeless as the priests mistook him for a vagrant. To not continue this movement is to hold a part of humanity apart from an intellectual labour where speech is never closed.

And as if he were clear of all suspicion, the candidate Nicolas Sarkozy intended to die in without ever finishing the undertaking. The authors take full responsibility for the content of this article, but they wish to thank Claude Gilliot, professor at the University of Provence, for his advice and his proposals for additional material.
