Hence, a subject sees me and because of the ontological split, of which I spoke earlier, can never see me as I am can I anyways? The difference between existence and identity projection remains at the heart of human subjects who are swept up by their own condition, their "bad faith".

Thus, in his "Letter on Humanism", Heidegger reminds us that the analysis of I What a book! Or rather, we act as though he does. This notion of authenticity appears closely related to Heidegger's, since it involves a mode of being that exhibits a recognition that one is a Dasein.

Sartre does pose the problem of the "situation limit" to human freedom, but with Sartre is not entirely averse to making logical argument; but too many of his conclusions rest on the shaky ground of these narrations of subjective experience.
