While there is nothing novel about pointing out that state punishment is reserved for poor people Reiman and Leighton, and Spectacle (Alternative Criminology) people of color Alexander, ; Mauer, in the carceral era, punishment is still undertheorized by criminologists as criminogenic in its own right, having produced social, psychic, political, and economic harms of unprecedented proportions that are the conditions for current abolitionist projects. A final logic animating abolitionist work concerns the normalized use of confinement outside the realm of penalty, through a suspension or absence The Culture of Punishment: Prison law removing due process protections, as a significant emerging force that needs to be contended with in working towards a world without carceral logics, policies and practices. The extent to which criminology can sustain an alternative or abolitionist perspective. Sim J. Remove FREE. Stigma Revisited. The attention drawn to these three phenomena, then, challenges the excavator of The Politics of Abolition.
