They include a moral code which fits all times and seasons, all ranks and conditions of life; which hardens a man where it is good that he should be hardened, and softens him where it is good that he should be softened. George Otway. An elite possessed of large landed estates, paternalistically ruling over the lower classes, was to be preserved against the onslaught of French revolutionary ideas.

The long view, Burke held, was relevant to the determination of the proper public. Resolved into their elements, the mainspring both of rational religion and of rational politics seems to be the sentiment of dependence. In contrast, the conservative side of the liberal tradition, in the spirit of Burke, sees in them pillars of freedom and seeks to conserve the nongovernmental institutions – the family, religious faith, the voluntary associations of civil society – that sustain. Following Aristotle, he remarks the fallacies which occur from disregarding the nature of the stuff which the politician has to work .
